

Life and Death in Nanking

In China, the decade following 1937 was characterized by cataclysmic social, political, and economic upheavals. The capital city of Nanking, savaged by Japanese atrocities and destruction, was a dismal place and a virtual tinderbox of riots and demonstrations, often directed at Americans. Author Peggy Kordick writes a compelling account of her years in Nanking between 1946 and 1948 revealing a pivotal time in international history. The story emerges from meticulously preserved letters the author wrote to her parents detailing the two years she and her husband spent as missionaries in China at the end of World War II. Candid photographs capture the mood of the period and the far reaching events of that time. Readers will remember Life and Death in Nanking long after the book is closed.
